They chose to make the announcement at a time when the Federal government had practically acknowledged that it was unable to offer any such guarantees.

While the ability of Zapata to make good his promise may be open to some doubts, it appears that Oroxco has from the first been able to qualify as a nonoods mountaineer, who settles his own woods mountaineer, who settles his own in readiness for the advancement of his personal interests. Unlettered and out of touch with the rest of the world, the Mexican backwoodsman needs no captain to lead him on forays for plunder. Taking away both Zapata and the pressure of government authority, conditions in Puebla and Morolos would probably be very little different from what they now are.

rolos would probably be very little different from what they now are.

But Northern Mexico breathes a different air. Its people, peon and landlord alike, have lived in the saddle too long and felt the freedom of the open spaces too long not to have developed a different individuality. Careless of the pollsh of civilization, of which they know much through contact with the busy life across the Rio Grande, they yet have a broader sense of genuine liberty and are more amenable to authority of their own making. Physically as well as mentally, they differ from the South. They have more money, better clothes; they must work harder for a living in a more rigorous climate. They have meyer succumbed to the curse of landlordism, as have their Southern countrymon, and the "Chihuahuaneso" has been a freer man from time immemorial. Consequently, with a modicum of liberty within his grasp, the Northerner knows better what to do with it and will fight more intelligently for its retention. This has been the wain sceret of the differwhat to do with it and will light more intelligently for its retention. This has been the main secret of the difference between the Orozco army and that of Zapata. From general down to humblest camp follower, a difference of history characterizes the two bodies.

eph Burton rejoiced yesterday over the action of the United States Senate eph Burton rejoiced yesterday over the action of the United States Senate on Wednesday in passing the House bill putting a prohibitive tax upon the manufacture or importation of white phosphorus matches. By this indirect method Congress, it appears, had accomplished what Colonsi Button tried to do in Virginia by a direct measure. Early in the session of the Legislature Colonal Button backed the bill offered by Senator A. C. Harman, prohibiting the sale of the ordinary "parlor match," called the "strike anywhere" variety. It was fought by representatives of match factories. After a conference a sort of compromise was agreed upon, affecting only the single-dipped match. This would have permitted the sale in Virginia, under certain restrictions, of strike anywhere matches which had been dipped twice, first in a so-called safety or inert composition, nonignitable on an abrasive surface. The result would have been the rather familiar match with a black head and a white tip. This must be struck on the extreme end, and is difficult to ignite when lying on the flood by stepping on it.

head and a white tip. This must be atruck on the extreme end, and is difficult to ignite when lying on the floor by stepping on it.

Abolition of the ordinary parlor match has been advocated by fire marshals throughout the country. The compromise agreed to in this State it now generally known and has been dubrid the "Virginia bill." But it was decided upon so late in the session that its passage through the General Assembly was impossible.

Diseases are said to be caused workers who labor in phosphorus match factories, notably what is known as "phossy jaw." But the fire riek was the main argument against the parlor match, and it is apparent that Congress has gone further than Virginia proposed to go.
